

A later secret society and a “spin-off” from the Illuminati was the strangely named “the League of the Just,” or “All men are Brothers.” It seems followers of this league attempt to promote and practice what is loosely called “Christian communism.” Some notable members who have adopted these utopian tenets of faith would be Leo Tolstoy, Daniel Berrigan S.J. [S.J. meaning “Society of Jesus”, the name the Jesuits give themselves], Martin Luther King, Desmond Tutu, and of course the current Jesuit Pope.

Karl Marx, of all people, was approached to update and revise (can you believe?) the earlier writings of Adam Weishaupt by the league. Weishaupt had died in 1830 and was becoming a forgotten man. Karl Marx, with Engels’ usual financial support (gained from sweatshops in Manchester), would later graft much of Weishaupt’s rules and ravings into his own 1848 Manifesto of the Communist Party. Some doubt Marx’s authorship of this political journal, and maybe this document, rather like Hitler’s infamous Mein Kampf, was ghost-written by a Jesuit from Farm Street in London. That’s just around the corner from the British Museum that Marx used as a second home, this being suggested by ex-Jesuit priest Alberto Rivera.

Later, it seems, the League of the Just would quietly morph into the communist league, but maybe that was always on the agenda, their political agenda anyway.

The fledgling communists would adopt May 1, which Weishaupt had chosen for the conception of the Illuminati, as their “May Day,” and it’s still celebrated today. The famous visual insignia would be unveiled as well then, this being the pentagram or five-pointed star. Naturally, it would be coloured red. This, we are informed, “was from the red shield on Meyer Anselm Rothschild’s ancestral home.”
